Description

Anterior segment photography with fluorescein angiography is performed to examine the iris. This procedure includes fluorescein angiography; which is for detection of abnormalities of retinal blood vessels. This policy describes the medical necessity requirements for anterior segment photography with fluorescein angiography.

Policy/Criteria

- I. It is the policy of health plans affiliated with Centene Corporation® (Centene) that anterior segment imaging with fluorescein angiography is medically necessary for the following indications:
  - A. Rubeosis iridis
  - B. Neovascular glaucoma
  - C. Diabetic retinopathy
  - D. Retinal vein occlusion
  - E. Uveitis
  - F. Iris cyst
  - G. Iris neoplasm
  - H. Anterior segment ischemia
  - I. Iris trauma or injury, including damage secondary to surgery

Background

Fluorescein angiography reveals information about the type, and thereby about the probable malignancy of iris tumors. In cases of iris cysts, angiography allows the differential diagnosis between congenital cysts and epithelial downgrowth cysts, in which a surgical treatment for the latter is absolutely necessary. Further indications for fluorescein angiography of the iris are neovascularization of the iris (rubeosis iridis), degenerative diseases, and anomalies of iris vessel formation. In these cases fluorescein angiography permits the diagnosis or differential diagnosis as well as follow-up. Neovascularization of the iris and angle may occur in response to retinal ischemia, uveitis, trauma, and radiation. Of these conditions, retinal ischemia due to diabetic retinopathy is the most common cause of neovascular glaucoma.
